VIEWS LETTER

Volume 56, Issue 1

AWD's Views, News & Items of Interest

September & October 2007

"Roosevelt's or Reagan's America? A Time for Choosing"

JOHN MARINI, a professor of political science at the University of Nevada, Reno, is a graduate of San Jose State University and earned his Ph.D. in government at the Claremont Graduate School. He has also taught at Agnes Scott College, Ohio University and the University of Dallas. He is on the board of directors of the Claremont Institute for the Study of Statesmanship and Political Philosophy, and a member of the Nevada Advisory Committee of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. Dr. Marini is the author or co-author of several books including, The Progressive Revolution in Politics and Political Science; The Politics of Budget Control: Congress, the Presidency, and the Growth of the Admin-istrative State; and The Founders on Citizenship and Immigration.

The following is adapted from a speech delivered at Hillsdale College on January 29, 2007, during a seminar on the topic, "America's Entitlement Society," co-sponsored by the Center for Constructive Alternatives and the Ludwig von Mises Lecture Series.

On January 11, 1944, President Franklin D. Roosevelt sent the text of his Annual Message to Congress. Under normal conditions, he would have delivered the message in person that evening at the Capitol. But he was recovering from the flu, and his doctor advised him not to leave the White House. So, he delivered it as a fireside chat to the American people. It has been called the greatest speech of the century by Cass Sunstein, a prominent liberal law professor at the University of Chicago. It is an

Continued on page 2, see CHOOSING

Remember the story titled "The Bow" by Gaylon Stamps that was in the May & June 2007 issue? The story below is his sister, Ann's version of the same story. Written Feb 20, 2007

"The Bow and Arrow"

As a female growing up in the Fifties, I was reared at a time when little girls were expected to wear dresses and act like "little ladies." Someone once convinced me if I could kiss my elbow, I would turn into a boy! The prospect of the privileges accompanying that idea caused me to spend a great deal of wasted time bringing my right and then left elbow extremely close to dislocation as I desperately attempted the impossible feat. As I am now happily married with grown children and precious grandchildren, I, praise God, that I was obviously unsuccessful!

There was a time, however, I truly envied my older brother (by sixteen months) who was often granted privileges that led to great adventures simply because he was born male!

One such occasion was the day he rode his bicycle way farther than the half mile Mother allowed us to roam at will. His quest down the country road was in search of the perfect materials to make his "now famous" bow and arrow. Back then, children had to be imaginatively creative to fill the seemingly endless summer hours without the "help" of noisy electronics. Complicating life for country kids was the fact we had to find ways to communicate

Continued on page 6, see Bow & Arrow

One of my greatest pleasures in writing has come from the thought that perhaps my work might annoy someone of comfortably pretentious position. Then comes the saddening realization that such people rarely read. John Kenneth Galbraith, economist (1908-2006) important speech because it is probably the most farreaching attempt by an American President to legitimize the administrative or welfare state based on the idea that government must guarantee social and economic security for all.

CHOOSING, continued from page 1

Thirty-seven years later, in his First Inaugural Address on January 20, 1981, President Ronald Reagan would deny that government could provide such a broad guarantee of security in a manner consistent with the protection of American liberty. Indeed, he would insist that bureaucratic government had become a danger to the survival of our freedom. In looking at the differences between the views of Roosevelt and Reagan, we can discern the distinction between a constitutional regime—in which the power of government is limited so as to enable the people to rule—and an administrative state which presupposes the rule of a bureaucratic or intellectual elite.

FDR's New Bill of Rights

When Roosevelt spoke to the nation that January night, he was looking beyond the end of World War II. In recent years, he said Americans have joined with like-minded people in order to defend ourselves in a world that has been gravely threatened with gangster rule. But I do not think that any of us Americans can be content with mere survival. Sacrifices that we and our Allies are making impose upon us all a sacred obligation to see to it that out of this war we and our children will gain something better than mere survival.

And, what was this "sacred obligation?" Roosevelt continued:

The one supreme objective for the future, which we discussed for each nation individually, and for all the United Nations, can be summed up in one word: Security. And that means not only physical security which provides safety from attacks by aggressors. It means also economic security, social security, moral security—in a family of Nations.

Government has a sacred duty, in other words, to provide security as a fundamental human right.

Roosevelt was well aware that this was a departure from the traditional understanding of the role of American government.

This Republic had its beginning, and grew to its present strength under the protection of certain inalienable political rights—among them the right of free speech, free press, free worship, trial by jury and freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. They were our rights to life and liberty. As our Nation has grown in size and stature, however—as our industrial economy expanded—these political rights proved inadequate to assure us equality in the pursuit of happiness. We have come to a clear realization of the fact that true individual freedom cannot exist without economic security and independence. "Necessitous men are not free men." People who are hungry and out of a job are the stuff of which dictatorships are made. In our day, these economic truths have become accepted as self-evident. We have accepted, so to speak, a second Bill of Rights under which a new basis of security and prosperity can be established for all...

Among these new rights, Roosevelt said, are "The right to a useful and remunerative job in the industries or shops or farms or mines of the Nation; The right to earn enough to provide adequate food and clothing and recreation; The right of every farmer to raise and sell his products at a return which will give him and his family a decent living; The right of every businessman, large and small, to trade in an atmosphere of freedom from unfair competition and domination by monopolies at home or abroad; The right of every family to a decent home; The right to adequate medical care and the opportunity to achieve and enjoy good health; The right to adequate protection from the economic fears of old age, sickness, accident and unemployment; The right to a good education."

The Constitution had established a limited government which presupposed an autonomous civil society and a free economy. But, such freedom had led inevitably to social inequality, which in Roosevelt's view had made Americans insecure in a way that was unacceptable. He had lost faith in the older constitutional principle of limited government. Rather, he thought that the protection of political rights—or of social and economic liberty, exercised by

Continued on page 3, see CHOOSING

I hope our wisdom will grow with our power, and teach us that the less we use our power the greater it will be.

~Thomas Jefferson, (1743-1826)

CHOOSING, continued from page 2

individuals unregulated by government—had made it impossible to establish a foundation for social justice, i.e., what he called "equality in the pursuit of happiness." He assumed that a fundamental tension exists between equality and liberty that can only be resolved by a powerful, even unlimited, administrative or welfare state.

Rejecting the Founders

The American founders, by contrast, thought that equality and liberty were perfectly compatible indeed, that they were opposite sides of the same coin. The principle of natural equality had been set forth in the Declaration of Independence, which clearly spelled out the way in which all human beings are the same: They are equally endowed with natural and inalienable rights. But along with this similarity, the Founders knew that differences are sown into human nature: some people are smarter, some are stronger, some are more beautiful, some are musically inclined while others have a predilection for business, etc. Political equality, which requires the protection of individual rights, produces social inequality, (or unequal achievement) precisely because of these unequal natural faculties. The preservation of freedom, therefore, in the Founders' view, requires a defense of private property, understood in terms of the protection of the individual citizen's rights of conscience, opinion, self-interest and labor. They thought that a constitutional order, by separating church and state, government and civil society, and the public and private sphere, makes it possible to reconcile equality and liberty in a reasonable way that is compatible with the nature of man. Thus, the Constitution limits the power of government to the protection of natural rights.

Roosevelt and his fellow progressives rejected the idea of natural differences between men, insisting that those differences arise only out of social and economic inequality. As a result, they redefined the idea of freedom, divorcing it from the idea of individual rights and identifying it instead with the idea of security. It was in the cause of this new understanding of freedom that America's constitutional form of limited government was gradually replaced—beginning with the New Deal and culminating in the late 1960s and 1970s—by an administrative or welfare state.

Roosevelt had made it clear, even before he was elected president, that government had a new and different role to play in American life than that assigned to it by the Constitution. In an October, 1932, radio address, he stated: "...I have...described the spirit of my program as a 'new deal,' which is plain English for a changed concept of the duty and responsibility of Government toward economic life." In his view, selfish behavior on the part of individuals and corporations must give way to rational social action informed by a benevolent government and the organized intelligence of the bureaucracy. Consequently, the role of government was no longer the protection of the natural or political rights of individuals. The old constitutional distinction between government and society—or between the public and private spheres—as the ground of liberalism and a bulwark against political tyranny had created, in Roosevelt's view, economic tyranny. To solve this, government itself would become a tool of benevolence working on behalf of the people.

This redefinition of the role of government carried with it a new understanding of the role of the American people. In Roosevelt's Commonwealth Club address of 1932, he said:

"The Declaration of Independence discusses the problem of government in terms of a contract.....
... Under such a contract, rulers were accorded power, and the people consented to that power on consideration that they be accorded certain rights. The task of statesmanship has always been the redefinition of these rights in terms of a changing and growing social order. New conditions impose new requirements upon government and those who conduct government."

Continued on page 4, see CHOOSING

A great writer is, so to speak, a second government in his country. And for that reason no regime has ever loved great writers, only minor ones.

-Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, novelist, Nobel laureate (1918-)

CHOOSING, continued from page 3.

But this idea of a compact between government and the people is contrary to both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. Indeed, what links the Declaration and Constitution is the idea of the people as autonomous and sovereign, and government as the people's creation and servant. Jefferson, in the Declaration, clearly presented the relationship in this way: "to secure these [inalienable] rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed..." Similarly, the Constitution begins by institutionalizing the authority of the people: "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

In Roosevelt's reinterpretation, on the other hand, government determines the conditions of social compact, thereby, diminishing not only the authority of the Constitution, but undermining the effective sovereignty of the people.

Reagan's Attempt to Turn the Tide

Ronald Reagan addressed this problem of sovereignty at some length in his First Inaugural in which he observed famously: "In this present crisis, government is not the solution to our problem, government is the problem." He was speaking specifically of the deep economic ills that plagued the nation at the time of his election. But he was also speaking about the growing power of a bureaucratic and intellectual elite. This elite, he argued, was undermining the capacity of the people to control what had become, in effect, an unelected government. Thus it was undermining self-government itself.

The perceived failure of the U.S. economy during the Great Depression had provided the occasion for expanding the role of the federal government in administering the private sector. Reagan insisted in 1981 that government had proved itself incapable of solving the problems of the economy or of society. As for the relationship between the people and the government, Reagan did not view it, as Roosevelt had, in terms of the people consenting to the government on the condition that government grant them certain rights. Rather, he insisted:

"We are a nation that has a government—not the other way around. And this makes us special among the nations of the Earth. Our government has no power except that granted it by the people. It is time to check and reverse the growth of government which shows signs of having grown beyond the consent of the governed."

In Reagan's view, it was the individual, not government, who was to be credited with producing the things of greatest value in America:

"If we look to the answer as to why for so many years we achieved so much, prospered as no other people on Earth, it was because here in this land we unleashed the energy and individual genius of man to a greater extent than has ever been done before. Freedom and the dignity of the individual have been more available and assured here than in any other place on Earth."

And, it was the lack of trust in the people which posed the greatest danger to freedom:

...we've been tempted to believe that society has become too complex to be managed by self-rule, that government by an elite group is superior to government for, by, and of the people. Well, if no one among us is capable of governing himself, then who among us has the capacity to govern someone else?

Reagan had been long convinced that the continued growth of the bureaucratic state could lead to the loss of freedom. In his famous 1964 speech, "A Time for Choosing," delivered on behalf of Barry Goldwater, he had said:

"...it doesn't require expropriation or confiscation of private property or business to impose socialism on a people. What does it mean whether you hold the deed or the title to your business or property if the government holds the power of life and death over that business or property? Such machinery already exists. The government can find some charge to bring against any concern it chooses to prosecute. Every businessman has his own tale of harassment. Somewhere a perversion has taken place. Our natural,

Continued on page 5, see CHOOSING

Justice will not be served until those who are unaffected are as outraged as those who are. ~Benjamin Franklin, (1706-1790) inalienable rights are now considered to be a dispensation of government, and freedom has never been so fragile, so close to slipping from our grasp as it is at this moment."

CHOOSING, continued from page 4.

Reagan made it clear that centralized control of the economy and society by the federal government could not be accomplished without undermining individual rights and establishing coercive and despotic control.

"...the full power of centralized government" was the very thing the Founding Fathers sought to minimize. They knew that governments don't control things. A government can't control the economy without controlling people. And they knew when a government sets out to do that, it must use force and coercion to achieve its purpose. They also knew, those Founding Fathers, that outside of its legitimate functions, government does nothing as well or as economically as the private sector of the economy.

Over the next 15 years, Reagan succeeded in mobilizing a powerful sentiment against the excesses of big government. In doing so, he revived the debate over the importance of limited government for the preservation of a free society. And, his theme would remain constant throughout his presidency. In his final State of the Union message, Reagan proclaimed "that the most exciting revolution ever known to humankind began with three simple words: 'We the People,' the revolutionary notion that the people grant government its rights, and not the other way around." And in his Farewell Address to the nation, he said: "Ours was the first revolution in the history of mankind that truly reversed the course of government, and with three little words: 'We the People."' He never wavered in his insistence that modern government had become a problem, primarily, because it sought to replace the people as central to the American constitutional order.

Like the Founders, Reagan understood human nature to be unchanging—and thus tyranny, like selfishness, to be a problem coeval with human life. Experience had taught the Founders to regard those who govern with the same degree of suspicion as those who are governed—equally subject to selfish or tyrannical opinions, passions and interests. Consequently, they did not attempt to mandate the good society or social justice by legislation because they doubted that it was humanly possible to do so. Rather, they attempted to create a free society, in which the people themselves could determine the conditions necessary for the good life. By establishing a constitutional government of limited power, they placed their trust in the people.

Up or Down, Not Right or Left

The political debate in America today is often portrayed as being between progressives (or the political left) and reactionaries (or the political right), the former working for change on behalf of a glorious future and the latter resisting that change. Reagan denied these labels because they are based on the idea that human nature can be transformed such that government can bring about a perfect society. In his 1964 speech, he noted:

"You and I are told increasingly that we have to choose between a left or right. Well, I would like to suggest that there is no such thing as a left or right. There is only an up or down—up to man's age-old dream, the ultimate in individual freedom consistent with law and order or down to the ant heap of totalitarianism. And regardless of their sincerity their humanitarian motives, those who would trade our freedom for security have embarked on this downward course."

In light of the differences between the ideas and policies of Roosevelt and Reagan, it is not surprising that political debates today are so bitter. Indeed, they resemble the religious quarrels that once convulsed western society. The progressive defenders of the bureaucratic state see government as the source of benevolence, and the moral embodiment of the collective desire to bring about social justice as a practical reality. They believe that only mean-spirited reactionaries can object to a government whose purpose is to bring about this good end. Defenders of the older constitutionalism, meanwhile, see the bureaucratic state as increasingly tyrannical and destructive of inalienable rights.

Ironically, the American regime was the first

Continued on page 6, see CHOOSING

Nearly all men can stand adversity, but if you want to test a man's character give him power. ~Abraham Lincoln to solve the problem of religion in politics. Religion, too, had sought to establish the just or good society the city of God—upon earth. But as the Founders knew, this attempt had simply led to various forms of clerical tyranny. Under the American Constitution, individuals would have religious liberty but churches would not have the power to enforce their claims on behalf of the good life. Today, with the replacement of limited government constitutionalism by an administrative state, we see the emergence of a new form of elite, seeking to establish a new form of perfect justice. But as the Founders and Reagan understood, in the absence of angels governing men, or men becoming angels, limited government remains the most reasonable and just form of human government. ~By Dr. JOHN MARINI, Ph.D.

Bow & Arrow, continued from page 1

with our siblings as they would probably be the only playmates we would see most of the week!

That said, I spent much of my time thinking of ways I could get Gaylon to play with me. He almost always had more important business to attend to, but occasionally he would semi-grudgingly help me build one of my playhouses in exchange for playing cowboys and Indians with him. Roy Rogers and Dale Evans come to mind. The Indians were usually the milo stalks or some other imaginary foe!

Truly, there is no way I can convey how much fun it was to play all those "make believe" games. There was so much wonderful dirt and freedom during that glorious time in our lives! We had school clothes and play clothes. As long as we were in our play clothes, we could get as dirty as our hearts desired!

Also, there is no way I can convey how special I felt when my brother took time to play with me! This, the day of the bow and arrow, was one of those times!

Gaylon had spent all day gathering his supplies, whittling, shaping each weapon to the best of his ability. I don't remember, but I am told when our Dad arrived home from work he even helped perfect my brother's day long efforts.

What I do remember was Gaylon's excitement in testing his prowess with the newly completed, better than "store bought" bow and arrows. In my neediness to be a part of his great adventure, I was reluctant, but conservatively willing to hold up a silly piece of cardboard that refused to stay upright by itself! Anyway, Gaylon "PROMISED" he would not shoot me! In my heart, I knew my brother would never shoot me on purpose, but even at the tender age of five I realized he really had had no practice!

Standing as far from the cardboard as possible, I held the target steady with my left hand. I think I may have even closed my eyes. All I know is one minute I was a happy participant, the next, I was a screaming sissy little girl as the homemade arrow ended its virgin flight, landing not in the intended target, but in the flesh between the thumb and first finger of my left hand!

In retrospect, I wish I could relive the next few moments of my life as they were a frenzied blur of tears, harsh words, and over reactive actions all flying toward my precious brother! I carry the scar on my left thumb today, but I carry a deeper scar in my heart for the fact that my tears and silly scream over a wound, that did not even bleed, caused such sorrow for my brother!

Dad broke all the arrows and the bow my brother had worked so hard to complete! Looking back now through the eyes of a parent, our Dad probably felt somewhat responsible for my flesh wound and ensuing tears. Still, the thought of that scene brings tears to my eyes!

Continued on page 7, see Bow & Arrow

The first amendment was not written to protect the people from religious values; it was written to protect those values from government tyranny. ~Ronald Reagan

Hopefully, from that day forward I was a bit more careful about my reaction to childhood injuries. Praise God... time heals all wounds of the body and heart! My brother and I continued to have grand adventures on the farm! I finally was allowed to wear jeans instead of a dress, and I was a worthy enough companion to my brother that he and our cousin Benny would make up "Tomboy Tests" for his sister, Janis, and me! A "Tomboy Test" was a feat of bravery one had to complete or be called a "Sissy"... but that's another story!

~ Ann Stamps Beddingfield

Around the House

~By Camry Doudney Schnauzer Dog

At some specific millisecond in time on the 23rd of September, Planet Earth will be at a specific point in space when the plane of its axis will be perfectly and exactly ninety degrees or perpendicular to the Sun. This will be true for a very short measurement of time as the earth is traveling around the sun at approximately 18.6 miles per second, or 66,884 miles per hour. simply means that for one day and one day only the time between sunset and sunrise will be aproximately identical to the time between sunrise and sunset——but only for one day, and then not exactly. The daylight then begins to shorten, and darkness begin to lengthen. This point in time is known by HBs (human beings) living in the northern hemisphere as the Autumn Equinox, and those living in the Southern hemisphere as the Spring Equinox. For us the long hot Summer is over and Autumn begins. Most HBs and dogs don't have a clue about things like this and could I'm only familiar with it because it is care less. something that the Boss told me about. He often tells me things that are interesting to him and not to anyone else. Some HBs may seem interested for a few seconds but seldom longer, and conversations about such topics are extremely annoying to Linda. So, when the Boss wants a conversation about something that almost no one wants to think about, the Boss provides me with a monolog. As a result, I'm probably one of the most educated dogs in all of Oklahoma. I know a lot of stuff that is only interesting to me and the Boss.

Things are going about the same around here. The Boss is trying to educate people who don't think they need an education, but check this out. There are those in powerful places that are constantly making hard-working people homeless. I overheard the Boss and Linda talking about a reservations agent who works with L'lana at Southwest Airlines. She had an issue over taxes with the Federal Government. She is a single mom trying to make ends meet and raise her child as best she can. It seems her Constitutional rights were totally ignored by the Federal Government or at least by more than a few people who work for the Federal Government. Her wages were garnished without the indictment of a grand jury, without a trial where she can examine evidence face to face with her opponent, and all this was done without a jury of her peers with whom she can plead her side of the issue. Each of these items mentioned are her rights guaranteed to all Americans under the Constitution for the United States of America. Who can make this decision to take away her earnings for work? Where did they get this authority?

Linda said, "There ought to be a law against such things!" The Boss replied, "There is a law, it's called the Constitution."

Well, life goes on and then it ends. I'm worried about Shell—she is becoming more and more lethargic—she is sometimes too tired to retrieve a kernel of popcorn.

Well, take it easy, keep your nose pointed into the wind and enjoy what is left of Summer and all of Autumn. ~Cam

Belief in Jesus is a miracle produced only by the effectiveness of redemption, not by impressive speech, nor by wooing and persuading, but only by the sheer unaided power of God.

~Oswald Chambers

FOOD FOR THE CELL Polysaccharidepeptides (PSP)

Scientists and researchers have developed a proprietary technology employing both biotechnology and nanotechnology to process essential nutrients (polysaccharidepeptides) from specially selected fractions of whole rice that creates a bioavailable form of carbohydrates and amino acids that directly feed the cell itself. When the cell has the proper nutrients (glucose and amino acids), in a form that the DNA within the cell recognizes, it can utilize this pure, biological fuel to feed the mitochondria (the energy source and powerhouse of the body), thus producing ATP, or pure energy, for every bodily process that occurs within the human being. Many of our foods that we consume today are so processed, devitalized and (wheat adulterated hydrogenated oils and trans-fatty acids, white rice, dairy products, and sugar) that the cells can no longer identify and thus metabolize these substances for the essential functions of the body, i.e. energy and cellular regeneration. If the cell cannot or chooses not to assimilate and utilize these nutrients it leads to an accumulation in the body of waste products, whereby, serious metabolic conditions such as hyperinsulinemia may develop. This condition and other resulting metabolic imbalances (Syndrome X) are often the root cause of the majority of dysfunctional metabolic processes such as diabetes, cardiovascular disease and degenerative neurological disorders such as Alzheimer's, Parkinson's and Multiple Sclerosis.

Immediate Benefits Recognized

Increased Energy & Vitality
Regulated Blood Sugar Levels
Improved Sleep Patterns & Less Stress in Life
Improvement of Digestion & Elimination
Memory Enhancement
Better Overall Circulation and Metabolism
Elimination of Bladder Urgency and Incontinence
Stopped Chronic Diarrhea
Improved Overall Mood, Emotions & Agitation
Weight Normalization

Enhanced Joint Movement and Flexibility
Pain and Joint Inflammation Reduction
Confusion, Pessimism and Worry Improved
Increased Resistance to Infection
Relief from Abdominal Pain
Reduced Colds and Flu
Improved Physical Strength
From Hopelessness to Optimistic (Excited about results)

Low Back Pain Subsided Feeling of Pins and Needles in Extremities improved

Able to Tolerate Changes in Temperature Improvement in Physical Balance and Vertigo Feeling in Legs and Toes that Had None Before Blurred or Double Vision Improved to disappeared

Overall Feeling Better, More Positive and healthier

SIDE EFFECTS

The other benefit of ALPHA-PSP's is that they have absolutely no known side effects and can be taken along with any other medications if necessary. The PSP's have actually been shown to even enhance the effects of prescription drugs an individual may currently be taking. As with all medications one should always consult with your physician before making changes in any prescription drug one may be taking. However, ALPHA-PSP's are a food and not classified as a drug.

Check it out the web-site; www.hmgwebmetting.com/awd

See Attached business Card and web site for more information. And, check out another product called Tunguska Blast.

Thanks for the cards, letters and donations. Your support is much appreciated. VIEWSLETTER
1015 West Dorchester Way
Mustang, OK 73064